KRYSTEN RITTER TALKS CHALLENGING NEW ROLE IN ORPHAN BLACK: ECHOES IN JUNE EMMY MAGAZINE

(LOS ANGELES – June 11, 2024) — Set in the year 2052, the sci-fi thriller Orphan Black: Echoes stars Krysten Ritter as a clone with attitude. Emmy talks with the highly regarded actress about what made her say yes to the AMC series and how her previous work playing tough characters prepared her for the role. The award-winning official publication of the Television Academy is on sale June 13.

Ritter’s road to fame was unconventional. The actress grew up on a working beef farm in Pennsylvania. “I’m so proud of being from a small town and being from a farm,” she says. “You don’t meet very many people in Hollywood with those kinds of beginnings.” At 15 she was scouted by Elite Models at a local mall and traded farming for modeling overseas. Young, ambitious and already planning for a career beyond modeling, she was determined to get the acting division of her agency to notice her. “I’d find any excuse to walk by their door and go [in an exuberantly cheerful voice] ‘Hey! How are you?’” Eventually her persistence paid off, and when an agent offered to send her on auditions for commercials, a Wendy’s spot changed the trajectory of her life.

After a series of roles that Ritter describes as "ditzy girls with short skirts and high heels," the actress made a name for herself in Hollywood by playing amoral Chloe in the ABC sitcom Don’t Trust the B---- in Apartment 23; recovering drug addict Jane Margolis on AMC’s Breaking Bad; and a complicated onetime superheroine in the Netflix series Jessica Jones. It’s no surprise that when casting began for the role of Lucy in Orphan Black: Echoes, a spinoff of the sci-fi thriller Orphan Black (premiering June 23 on AMC, AMC+ and BBC America), Ritter’s name was on everyone’s lips. When showrunner Anna Fishko began rewatching her previous work, “I felt like there was a lot of overlap there — in a good way — to what we were looking for in Lucy,” Fishko says. “Krysten’s had a long career of playing tough but also vulnerable women who have an emotional center.”

In the cover story “Black to the Future,” Ritter shares that she said yes to Echoes not because it was in her wheelhouse, but because it felt like a challenge. The role required her to learn American Sign Language and Spanish and revive her Jessica Jones stunt skills. “Lucy’s really good at so much stuff. That was exciting and terrifying at the same time, and that fear was really appealing to me,” said Ritter.

Orphan Black: Echoes leaps 37 years into the future from the original series and has its own distinctive story line. “I’m a different kind of clone from the original,” says Ritter, whose character is suffering from what was initially mistaken for amnesia. “They’re making human printouts from super high-def 3D scans. So, I was printed at age 34 and wake up with a glitch, because I don’t know anything.” The actress earned praise from her cast and crew. “She’s a really unique performer,” says John Fawcett, who directed three Echoes episodes and cocreated the original Orphan Black with Graeme Manson. “She’s not going to make conventional decisions. When a performer like Krysten is allowed to be open and free, you get interesting results, and a lot of that winds up on the screen. That’s what’s so cool about her. She’s quirky, different, unexpected.”

When she’s not busy on set, caring for her young son or knitting (she graced the cover of Vogue Knitting magazine in 2018), Ritter is directing (The Girl in the Woods) or writing novels, including the 2017 psychological thriller Bonfire.
